An amusing character sketch will not make play. A dainty network of humanity, care fully spread through the chapters of a book may entertain and delight the reader. Transfer it to the stage and its charm will be lost; all the aroma of the stage gone. The reason is that the stage is primarily the place for action, for the representation of scenes that change, and stories that appeal kaleidoscopically. Characters may be sketched in the drama, of course, but not by words. Their effect upon the other personages of the story is pretty well all that can be permitted. Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith in "Col. Carter of Cartersville" has drawn a most delightful old Southern gentleman, Col. And what a crying, indelent, disreputable shame it is that such should be the case: Theatre-goers here know the types of the viliainous squire of melodrama, the flut-tering cowager and the injured heiress. They know these types so well. But the character growths of this country are perfectly unknown. The late attempts to sketch a few of them have proved to be revelations. Under the caption of "Here is Katie Metz Again; but Now She Is Salling Under the Name of Annie Smith," in THE EVENING WORLD of the 16th Inst., you say : " Annie you loved to praise? If so, whose fault has it been? I heard a wife say that her lover, before marriage, often said when he saw her face flushed from cooking. "What a shame to spell that lovely skin standing over a fire?" This same man, as her husband, forgot his gaitantry so far (on moving day) as to become indignant when he found that the taking down of the slove had been left to him. Thus the difficulty in the so-called management of wives is occasioned by the sudden failing off of a man's attentions from the lover to the husband. Don't be afraid of the stand who desire to reform and are publicly as you made it.
